Outside Looking In

I was traveling down Baker Street in Costa Mesa following four teenagers in a white Jeep. As we approached the major intersection at Red Hill the traffic light was red. I began to slow down but the Jeep kept charging forward. My utterance, “oh man, oh man” turned to a loud “Holy @%!” as two cars came barreling in from the right as the Jeep entered the intersection. I braced for the horrendous T-Bone crash, but by the grace of God nothing happened.

The potential of the event shook me. One minute we are blissfully rolling along only to be blindsided by a life-changing event. If I had the chance to interact with the driver of the Jeep, I could have prevented this potential disaster. From my perspective, I saw the red light the Jeep driver was blind to.

The same things happen with projects. Plans are put in place. Everyone is working hard and feeling good about the progress. Then something as simple as missing one little traffic light blows the entire project out of the water. The result can be fatal and cost millions of dollars.

During these economic times no one can afford a critical project delay. Waypoint’s Strategic Project Navigator™ provides a powerful assessment of critical project risk. A fast efficient third party review will ensure your project arrives on time and safe to the planned destination.

Why take the risk and be surprised by the unknown. Give us a call.
